BACK TO SCHOOL

Every year the date of the first day of school seems to fall earlier in the calendar. I remember the first day of school for me at St. Boniface in Anaheim was always the Tuesday after Labor Day. (This was often followed by days of hot, dry Santa Ana winds coming off the desert which would make our whole class edgy.) The return to school was the end of summer liberation and the taking up of new challenges, some of which were pretty interesting. At school we faced a new teacher who might turn out to be friendly and nice, or no-nonsense and a disciplinarian. I enjoyed looking through the new textbooks, especially if they had pictures, though the books were rarely really new but hand me downs from the class before us. We were to cover them by cutting and taping together paper sacks from the market and we were never to write in them (not even in pencil) as the books would be used again the following year by other students. The kids in the class above us would try to psyche us out about our new subjects, "Now you'll have to learn long division and it is really, really hard." This anxiety tended to make us sentimental about our former teacher, "Sr. Mary was so nice to us; she taught us songs and didn't give us homework on weekends. What can't we just keep Sr. Mary?"

The first order of business of a new teacher was to establish order in the classroom. Without that, little learning could be accomplished. As students, we had to be taught who was in charge and what we were to focus on at school. We were told what subjects we would be studying, where to store our lunches, what kind of paper, pencils, pens and other items we would need. If we want to say something or answer a question, we must raise our hands and wait to be called on. No shouting out would be allowed. We were to sign all our work with our complete name. (I remember in the fifth grade there were four other Mikes with me in class.) We were told to sit in alphabetical order according to our last names. This was later adjusted once the teacher learned our names because the short students in the back were getting their views blocked by the bigger students in front of them.

When we were taking tests, we were to put our pencils down immediately when the teacher said so.

I was grateful for this ordering. That way I got to know how to keep on the teacher's good side. Nobody wanted a reputation as "the teacher's pet," of course, but neither did you need to be the teacher's object of concern. No matter what, you didn't want the teacher to send home a personal note to your parents sealed in an envelope.

What I enjoyed most was learning stuff. I was curious by nature and that turned out to be an advantage for someone wanting an education. I was always raising my hand with questions. "Hold on, Mr. Heher," teachers said to me often enough "We'll be getting to that next week. Be patient." There was a dictionary in the front of the classroom on a stand; if there was a word a student didn't understand, the teacher called that one forward to look it up. My grandmother had been a teacher and she knew what kind of reference books to give her grandkids as gifts so we could look things up for ourselves at home. (This was an improvement over what she had given us before we started school, which were pajamas, and which didn't, in our book, count as presents at all.)

The surprise for me was making friends with my classmates. I had playmates who lived down my block but here at school there were so many more who were not just people to play with. I had smart friends who could answer my dumb questions so I didn't have to ask them in class. Other friends were great mimics and, when we got together at recess, they could sound just like our teacher—the same vocabulary, the same voice, the same mannerisms. At the start my friends were almost all other boys but in time I made friends with some of the girls who had similar interests to mine.

School was my introduction to the wider world beyond my house and neighborhood. It was my introduction to the outside world and I was finding it fascinating.

HARVEY RELIEF SECOND COLLECTION

In the days following Hurricane Harvey's landfall on the Texas coast, Eileen and I have checked in with each other almost every day. Both of us have family in Austin and we have been following the weather maps. Hers are doing fine but my brother and his wife were without power for a period. We were relieved to see the storm moving eastward away from Austin. But many in a large part of Texas were not so lucky. As the rain continues, there will be even more devastation and so our hearts remain in prayer at Mass for the people in Texas who have been affected by the storm. Archbishop José Gomez, Vice President of the USCCB, has asked all dioceses throughout the United States to take up a special collection to support the relief and rebuilding efforts needed after Hurricane Harvey. This will be our second collection this weekend.

These funds will be used to support the efforts of Catholic Charities USA as they reach out to provide humanitarian aid in the form of water, food, shelter, and medical care as well as support to local dioceses in their care for those impacted by the hurricane. Our diocese will immediately remit all received funds directly to the USCCB.

In California fear of earthquakes keeps us awake at night and we spent many years in a very serious drought. We know what it is to be at the mercy of Mother Nature. Please be generous to those who have been devastated by wind and rain.
