PARENTING

We have an agreement with the swim school across the street allowing their clients to park in our lot during the week. Nearly every time I am in the parking lot I find fathers or mothers, sometimes grandparents, dutifully marching off with their children to the school, with towels and bags and whatnot in one hand and the hand of their child in the other. The adults remind the children to look both ways before crossing the street.

This is only one of the many possible tasks that each day parents are called upon to complete. Someone has to look through the pantry and fridge to make a list, so groceries can be bought, and meals can be cooked, though, truth be told, parents are often tempted to load up the kids and drive through a fast food restaurant to simplify the plan.

People have been wearing clothes for centuries and so there is always laundry to sort and wash and fold. And don't forget the sheets and towels! Open the windows and doors and soon someone will have to go through the house with a dust rag. Things break and need to be fixed, or replaced, which usually starts with a stop at the hardware store and then requires checking out sights on the internet to figure out how to install the strange new item, this despite the careful instructions received from the guy at the hardware store.

Lawns get mowed and gardens weeded, every couple of months the garage gets swept out, band aids are applied to a child's cuts and bruises and sunscreen on the face and ears when children go to play outdoors. Bills are paid on time, every few days halls and rooms are vacuumed and swept, light bulbs are replaced, and house plants are watered in the sink. You can understand why people with a big house would need a lot of money to hire people to keep the place up. The To Do List is endless.

In my family, by default my father was Mr. Fix-it. No one else was going to do it, though we all agreed that my dad was not always up to the task at hand, particularly if it involved the use of power tools. We gave him wide berth. At some point he would cry out, "Hell's Bells!" And we would then give him even wider berth.

My mother took charge of the kitchen. She and my father would do the week's grocery shopping on Saturdays. As to the week's menu, my mom decided if it was going to be chicken or hamburgers or beef stew or the ingredients for some recipe she found in a magazine. Will it be pasta with chicken? Fries with hamburgers? She is the one who decided, though we were allowed to remind my parents not to forget to get some ice cream or, better, ice cream sandwiches for deserts. Then one day it occurred to my mother that her children could be taught to cook, so she taught us, offering sage advice from her seat at the bar.

Even when we take them for granted, parents hardly notice. A new tie or tool on Father's Day, roses on Valentine's day, a dinner cooked for mom on Mother's Day without destroying the kitchen in the process, that's all they expect or want. They have learned the most important lesson: it is better to give than to receive. A lesson I hope all of us, their children, also learn.

Msgr. Mike
