PRECIOUS

Since I work weekends, I don't get to the Farmer's Market as often as I would like. Most of the time the vegetables in Pavilions are good enough, but if I want something like a really good vine-ripened tomato—a tomato so perfect it requires not a shake of salt—then I've got to get myself to the Farmer's Market, and get there early for the best selection. I could make a whole meal out of one of those sweet babies.

When I lived in Rome many years ago, I found just such luscious tomatoes at the Farmer's Market that took place in our neighborhood piazza. The vegetables there were the best I had ever eaten but I learned a hard lesson. They looked so good, I would buy a big sack of them, but they had been harvested to be eaten right away. If I left them out on a plate for more than a day, they would be wilted. The tomatoes especially would burst their skins and shrivel down to a tiny hulk.

By contrast I remember my parents going to the market every Saturday, filling up the shopping cart to the brim with everything we would eat in the coming week—breakfast, lunch, dinner, snacks, meals and deserts. Occasionally we would need to use a second cart if guests were coming to dinner that week. (Those were the days when my father loved to barbeque big T-bone steaks, a whole one for each person.) Unless there was a special salad on Sunday, fresh fruit and vegetables were scarce; peas and carrots and corn would be frozen in blocks to be warmed up with a little water at dinner time. We'd only go to the market during the week if my mom left off an ingredient on her Saturday list. When we were old enough, she would send one of us on our bike to fetch the needed item.

Precious are those items that last, or so we think:

diamonds, gold, silver, bronze, marble and other quarried stone, costly hard woods. You can count on them; they will last; that's their virtue. The worst that can happen is that you will have to polish off a little tarnish on your silverware.

But we also cherish other things precisely because they don't last: budding flowers, vegetables right out of the field, fruits with sweetness bursting as you bite into them, the leaves on maple and other flat leaved trees as they fade colorfully in autumn, the birds that show up in spring and fly south in winter. Their fragility adds to the pleasure we take in them. We look up in spring and smile, seeing the birds returning; in the fall fathers get out their rakes to harvest the leaves spread across the ground, only to have to do it again a few days later. Back east over the whole neighborhood there would be the unmistakable smell of burning piles of leaves, tended by fathers and their older children.

We think of our relationships as lasting, and the best do last for years and years, so much so that we sometimes take them for granted. But a dear neighbor suddenly moves to Bakersfield for a job promotion; parents and grandparents die, often without forewarning; children marry, move out and begin families of their own, sometimes nearby, frequently far-flung. One day somebody in a bad mood says the wrong things—unexpectedly terrible things—ending communication abruptly. Will an apology ever be offered? Who knows? Apologies seem to have gone out of fashion of late. Too bad.

Ecclesiasticus tells us that everything has its season, but you only find the preciousness of every season when you heed it.

Msgr. Mike
